

The Spectrum Low Volatility Fund Update

Fund Commentary

A modest slowdown in key economic areas such as housing and employment has kept investors anticipating rate cuts by the Fed with September as the most likely beginning of the cycle according to Fed Funds futures. At the end of July, Chairman Powell hinted the data coming in supported the idea of rate cuts beginning soon yet they will remain data dependent, monitoring if such data trends change course. Oddly enough, investors may have interpreted the hints of an onset to lower rates as a sign of needed intervention to a potential weakening economy. Interest sensitive bond areas, including treasuries, were firm throughout the month and saw an added boost after the Fed meeting. Economically sensitive areas held mostly steady perhaps battling the idea of some economic headwinds with that of potential rate stimulation later in the year. Similar to June, the Spectrum Low Volatility Fund (SVARX) kept trading light in areas such as high yield, asset-backed, and floating rate while adding to municipal bond investments. Management will continue to monitor what may be a macro change in the bond market to steady or lower rates which may lead to improved trends in various bond classes versus the general observation of jagged patterns year-to-date.

SVARX (Fixed Income) vs. Sector Indices

The chart above shows how the Fund performed against related sector indices for the past 12 months. The Fund focuses on domestic fixed income and credit markets, but can invest globally when prudent. The management team navigates the various bond classes and their specific characteristics. Various bond classes tend to move in different directions from each other, as some tend to perform better when there is economic growth while other classes perform better during times of heightened instability. The Fund's holdings and exposure can shift on a daily basis allowing it to be nimble. Spectrum's core philosophy is to achieve competitive returns without sacrificing the goal of risk management.
